Keymacro is a utility that allows you to write your own macros. These macros can be recorded and made accessible to all other keystrokes or to other Windows applications. You can also see a list of all the macros currently defined and create your own. Features: Macros can be defined to perform functions such as Web search, Email program, File download, set time, alarm, convert to and from HEX, HEX to ASCII, Convert from text to Hex, download from FTP server, download from HTTP server, math formula, and more. macros may be defined to work between any combination of programs, such as Mail/Web/FTP/PSTN. Macros are defined through a list of keystrokes, and macros can be defined to be permanent, automatic, or temporary, and can be linked with other macros as well as with ordinary keystrokes. A list of currently defined macros is available, and can be edited or deleted, even while macros are being defined. Macros are recorded, and a list of those macros is also provided, for editing or deletion. A visual representation of the keystrokes in a macro, as well as a list of currently defined macros, is provided. Web sites are provided which allow you to quickly and easily edit a macro. The macro can be activated through the Hotkey Manager. The macros can be accessed through the Macro List. Quit feature can be used to exit the application without saving macros. Help feature can be used to get help on using macros. Work with Text, Rich Text, and HTML files are possible through macros. A tool in the Windows Registry that lets you safely remove components from your system. Some programs don't work properly if they can't access the Windows Registry. The standard Windows Registry may be blocked by many different anti-malware software. Chances are you find it pretty difficult to get up in the morning, and this is exactly where alarms come in handy. However, an alarm's functionality doesn't end here, and can be used to set up all kinds of reminders. For instance, AlarmJ is a simple tool in case you got something coming in the next 90 minutes which you don't want to miss. Can be used on the go A cool thing about it is that it's portable, and, on the one hand, this means there's no setup involved. On the other hand, it's easy to carry around on a thumb drive just so you're able to set alarms regardless of the computer you're using. Don't worry though, because the health status of the target PC is not affected, since registry entries remain intact. There's not really any effort put into the visual design, but this doesn't make the application difficult to handle. A couple of fields need to be filled in with the right values for minutes and seconds. A set of buttons is also in plain sight so you choose the alarm sound, test it out, and start the alarm. Only offers a countdown mode. Unfortunately, there's only one method of operation, and that's to configure a countdown timer in minutes. You can't go beyond 90 minutes, which affects overall practicality. There is the possibility to have multiple alarms configured, but this means you need to launch a different instance for each new alarm. The application comes with several preset audio alerts which ring when the specified time comes.

There's no direct method of editing them from the window, so changing sounds needs to be done by replacing files in the source folder, but be sure to keep the exact name. To sum it up Taking everything into consideration, we can state that AlarmJ isn't really what you're hoping to find in a personal alarm clock. There's no possibility to set an exact time for the alarm, leaving you with only a simple, 90 minutes countdown mode.
