Ostrya violacea Ostrya violacea, the crested sedge or crested sedge vine, is a climbing plant or trailing ground cover in the sedge family (Cyperaceae). It has stolons (trailing stems) which it uses to grow across other plants, using the stalks as stems. It is most common in damp, low-light conditions, and it is usually absent from dry habitat such as prairies. Growth The crested sedge has a slender appearance, particularly when growing very quickly, which eventually produces a mat that can cover both aquatic and terrestrial habitats. It grows better in moist substrates, and prefers full sun and lots of water. It propagates by the formation of stolons, which are aerial or underground runners that allow the plant to migrate from one location to another. Once a stolon has established, the plant sends out leaf blades from its nodes, with alternating leaves at the top and bottom. It is a perennial plant, growing from corms, rhizomes, and rootstocks. Cultivation Ostrya violacea grows in a wide variety of water conditions, and it can survive flood waters as well as having access to pond margins. This translates to some of the plants being able to be grown in the wild. But, the crested sedge can also grow in containers, and it is not very sensitive to being watered regularly in both containers or natural habitat. It does not like being soggy, but it can also tolerate dri
