Tissue fillers represent an alternative to traditional surgical interventions and may offer the potential for permanent correction of facial aging. Polymer blending is the main method of manufacturing various FDA-approved permanent skin fillers and offers an elegant approach to this burgeoning area of dermatology. We present a novel degradable, biocompatible polyurethane (PU) for permanent fillers that provides the desired biocompatibility and resiliency, while rapidly degrading to polymer-free liquid. PU fabrication involves the isocvanate-based reaction between diamine and glycol diisocyanate to yield an open-network structure with excellent mechanical properties (26,300 PSI elongation at break, Young's modulus 12 GPa). Upon degradation, these polymers release ammonium ions and proline-rich degradation byproducts. This is verified by solution studies of these polymers, as well as by in vitro and ex vivo tissue engineering studies. While this work demonstrates the potential of biodegradable polyurethanes for permanent fillers, further investigation is needed to determine the effectiveness of fillers composed of these biocompatible polymers as well as durability of the blend over time. It's the first time the Rays have a coach who has coached in New York and this is going to be an interesting football team for a number of reasons. Consider this: The Rays travel to New York, have a bye week and return home to play the Red Sox, who just won the World Series, on the last Thursday of the season. A few days later, they will play at Fenway Park. These are three games the Rays can realistically play this season, but the fact they don't go to New York to play the Yankees
