First, we analysed only five genes of the canonical toxigenic pathway and while these are important for production of spore in the infective stage, much more genes of B. anthracis are involved in this stage. With the development of next generation sequencers, the probability to sequence more genes of B. anthracis will increase in the near future. However, the data obtained with B. anthracis Ames and CDC MR 775 strains are expected to show similar results and interpretation of the data obtained with the sequenced strain. Our data confirm that *B.

anthracis* Ames and CDC MR 775 strains react equally well to the stress of 0.04 % NaOH incubation in the conditions of plate survival assay when compared to the resuscitation capacity of spores incubated in RPMI 1640 medium. In addition, the gene expression profiles of the two strains are equally similar. Thus, it can be hypothesized that the data obtained with Ames and CDC MR 775 strains are representative for the spore population in soil as suggested in the study of \[@CR26\]. Furthermore, although the two strains react similarly to the stress of 0.04 % Na
